That WINNING COSTUME

“HEY, Jim!” shouted Tommy Peters. “Have ya heard the NEWS? It’s great! It—it’s COLOS-SAL, that’s what it is!”

“What’s heatin’ your blood-pres-sure?” inquired Jimmie Adams.

“There’s gonna be a swell cos-tume ball at the Lift-’Em-Up-And-Put-’Em Down Dance Em-porium tonight,” breathed Tom-my. “An’ get THIS! The guy with the best costume wins a complete set of drums that used to belong to Hoody Werman’s Original Swing Band!”

Jimmie said only one word—“WOW!”—and headed for home. He found his mother in the kitchen and lost no time in getting to the point. “Ya gotta help me, mom!” he gurgled. “I—er—need a small loan!”

“A loan? What for, son?”

Jimmie’s mother looked doubtful. “Well, I don’t know . . . I have-n’t any extra money now, and I don’t think your father—”

“But mom, you don’t under-stand! If I win, I get Hoody Wer-man’s own set of drums! It’s what I’ve always wanted! Why, I may become a famous drummer!”

“Oh, no!” Determination settled like a hostile mask on his mother’s face. “We’re not going to have you banging away at any DRUMS! This place is enough of a madhouse as it is! So that costume ball is OUT!”

Mothers could be awfully difficult sometimes, Jimmie reflected bitterly. But he wasn’t giving up yet! He was going to that ball—and if he couldn’t BUY a winning costume, he’d set his brain to work and MAKE one! As he sat grimly on his bed, the idea came to him in a flash! He stole quietly into his father’s bedroom and opened the closet door. There it was—pop’s tuxedo! Pop wouldn’t mind if he just borrowed it for the evening.

Lifting out the tuxedo lovingly, Jimmie placed it on the bed, then opened the drawer of his father’s dresser. There, in all its eye-filling glory, lay pop’s red and purple polka dot bow tie. Tuxedo and bow tie, plus the microphone he had made for the radio course in school, and Jimmie would go to the ball as—THE VOICE!

Racing to the basement laundry room, where he’d be unobserved, Jimmie tried on his costume. True, the tuxedo was a little big, but that would just make the effect more realistic. The flowing bow tie was perfect. Holding the microphone in a loving grasp, he swayed gently, closed his eyes dreamily and opened his mouth to sing. And then it happened! Suddenly, Jimmie felt a vicious tug at his jacket. He looked down—and his eyes widened in horror. His elbow had jogged the switch of the clothes wringer, setting it in motion—and the tails of the tuxedo were being drawn through the rollers! Whirling frantically, he tried to pull away—only to see the streaming bow tie caught and pulled into the same rollers! “Help!” he shouted. “HELP!”

Footsteps hurried down the stairs to the laundry. It was his mother, who flipped off the clothes wringer switch, helped him free himself, then looked at him with wrath in her eyes. The jacket and tie were ripped beyond repair! “Your father’s tuxedo!” she cried. “And the beautiful bow tie I bought him for Christmas! Go up to your room, young man! You aren’t budging out of there until tomorrow!”

Two hours later, as Jimmie sat gloomily on his bed, there was a knock on the door, followed by the sound of quickly receding footsteps. Opening the door, he saw a large cardboard box, with a note attached. Unsigned, it read: “All is forgiven! We’re going out for the evening, and you can do the same. Take a look inside this box!” And inside the box was the grotesque, tusked head of a comic elephant! It had big, flopping ears, a long trunk and a funny, foolish look which was a killer-diller! Mom had come through after all! Jeepers—WOTTA COSTUME!

It was late when Jimmie returned, and he opened the door very quietly. If only pop wasn’t around! But then he heard his father’s commanding voice from the parlor. “That you, son? Come in here!” Oh-oh! With awful visions of the torn tuxedo and bow tie tormenting him, Jimmie stepped into the parlor cautiously, lugging two heavy bundles with him. He feared the worst—but stopped in surprise at the beaming look on his father’s face.

“I see you won the drums!” pop said. “I’m glad the judges liked the costume I chose for you!”

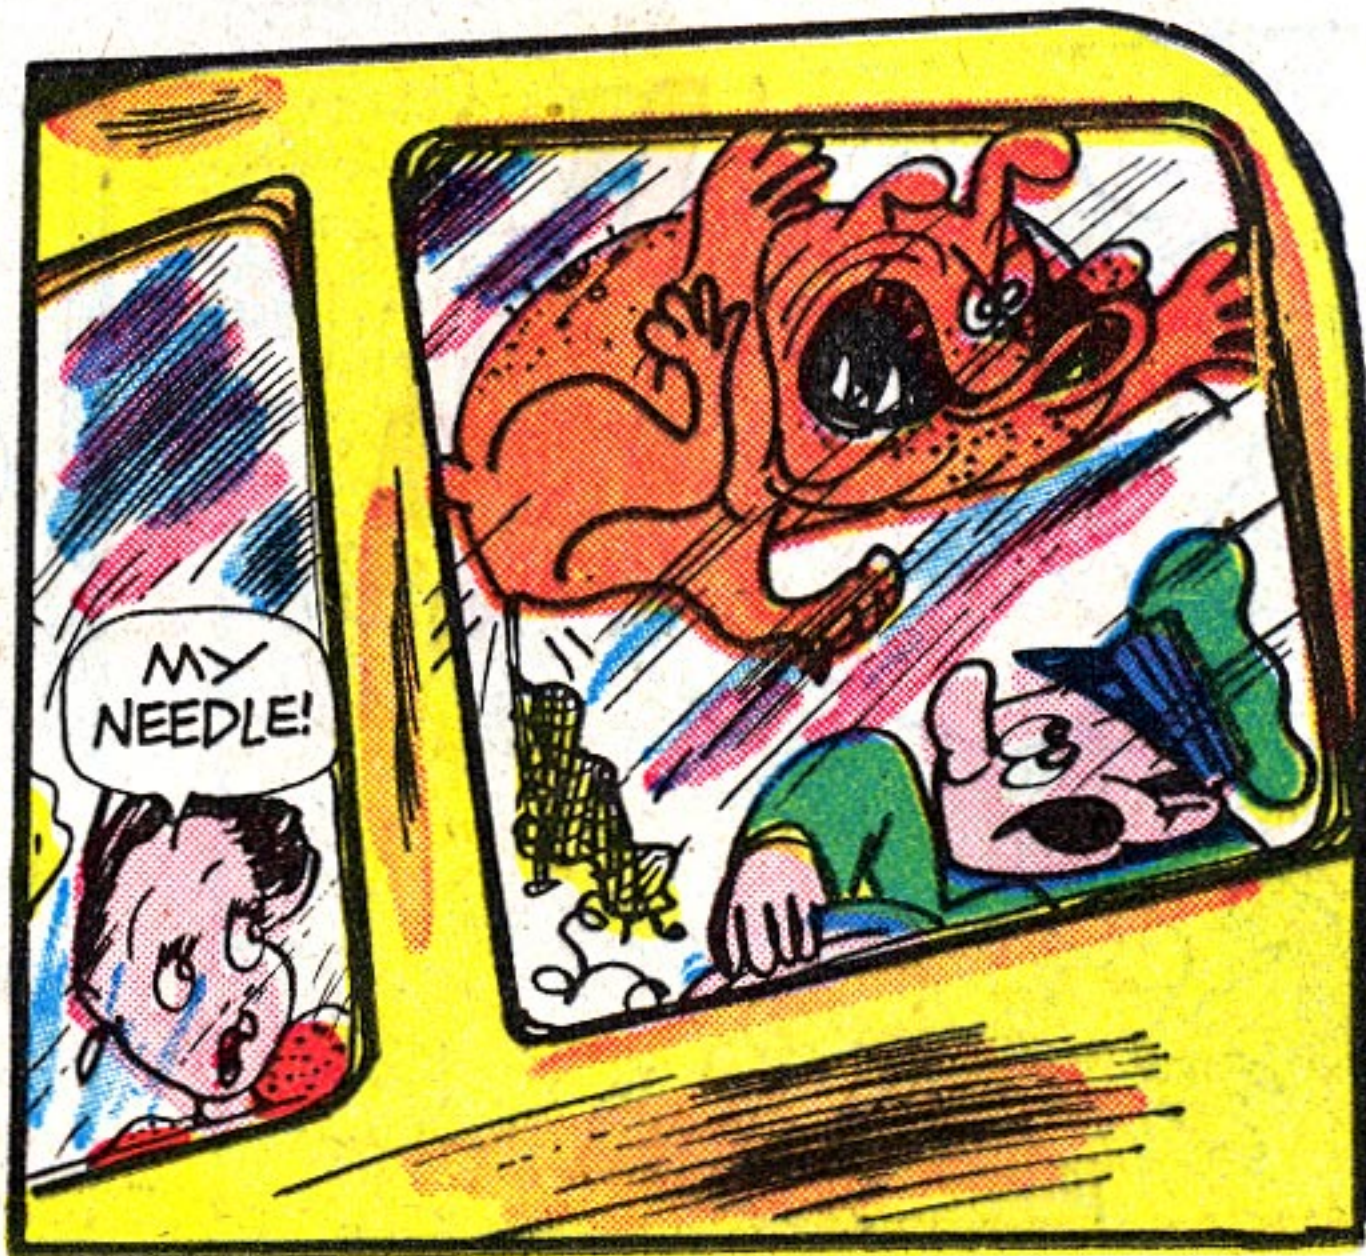

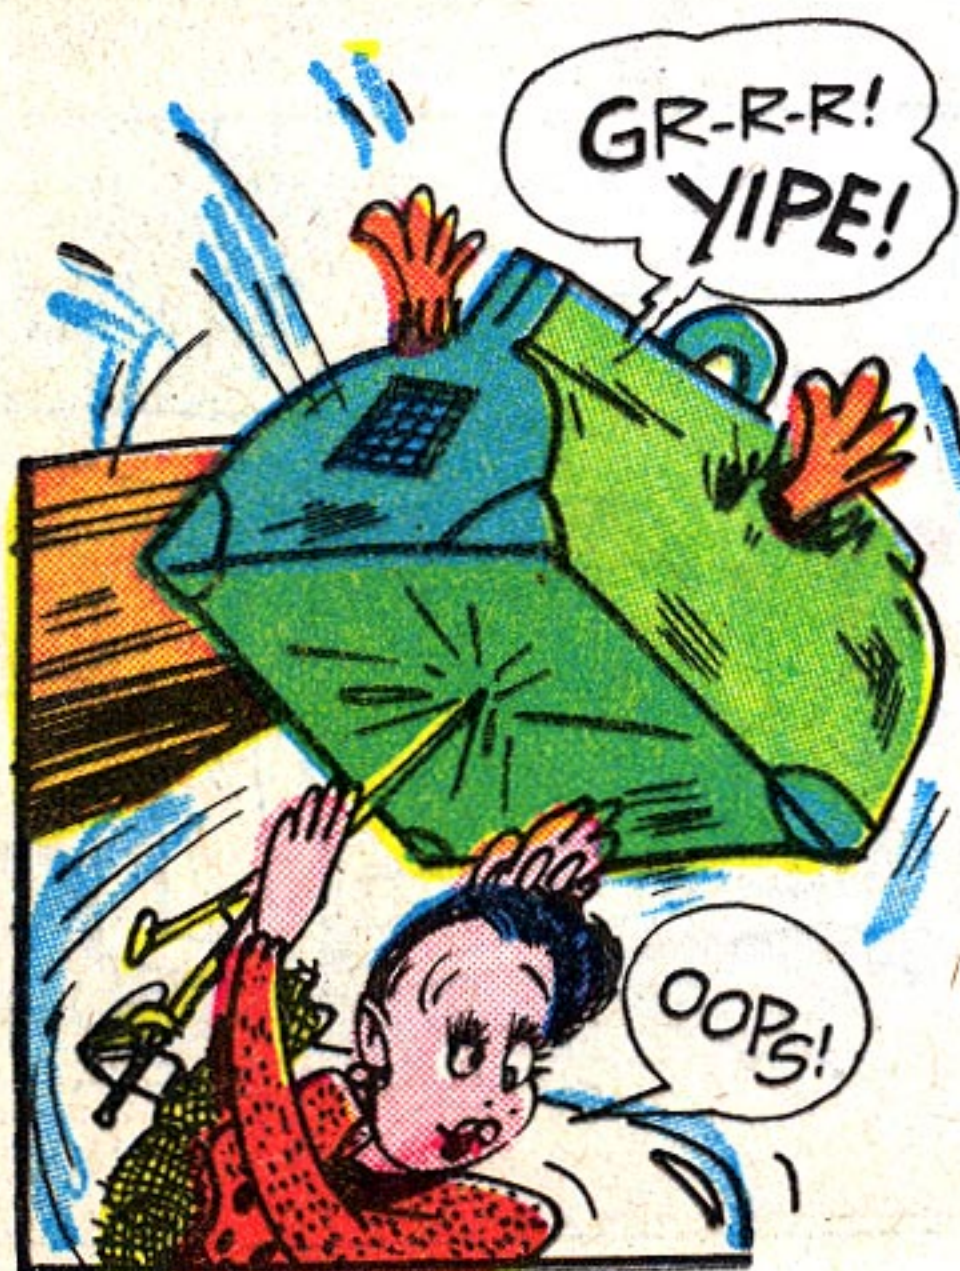

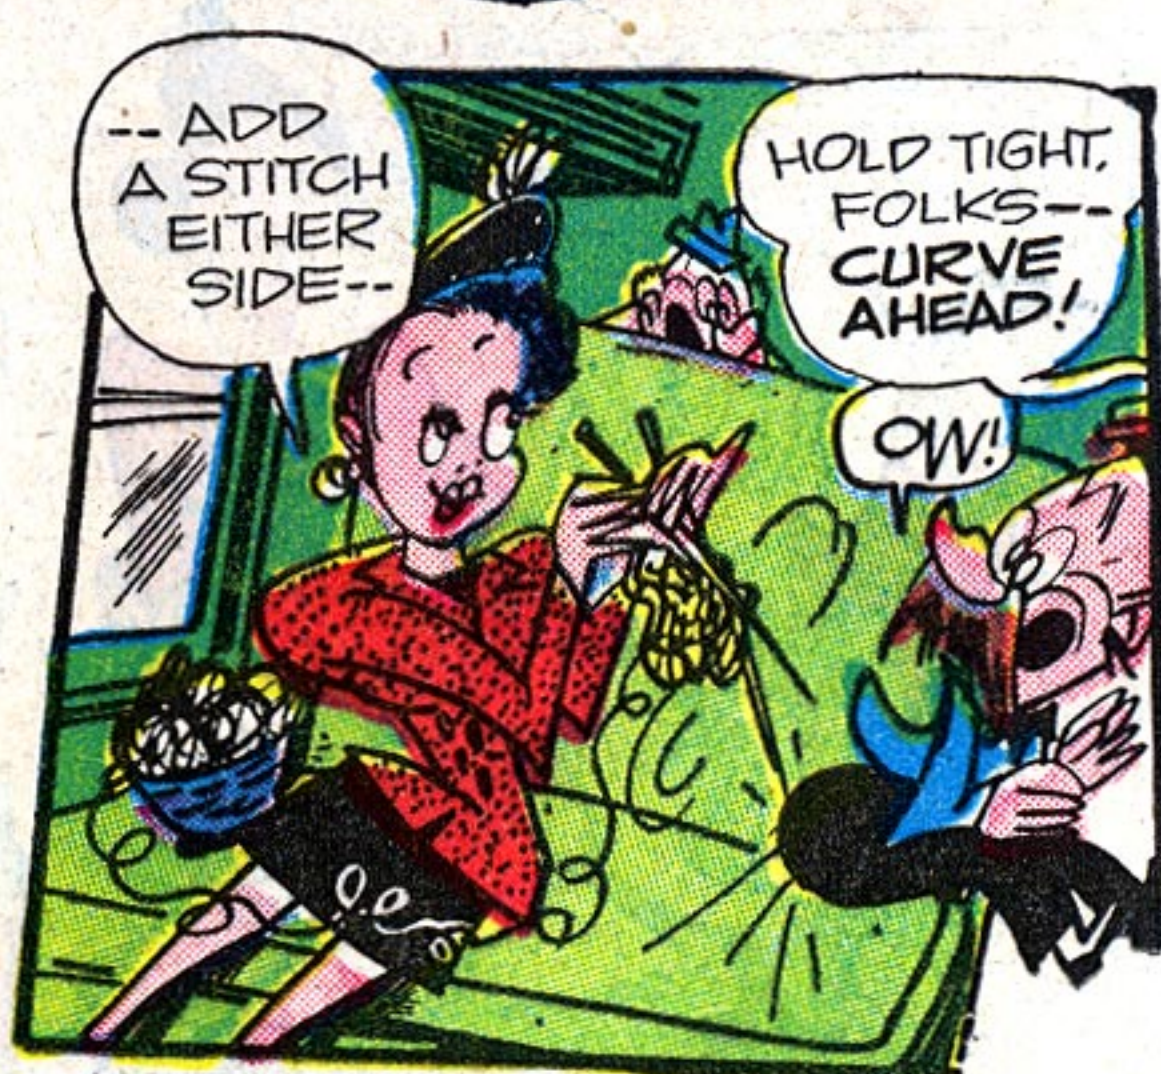

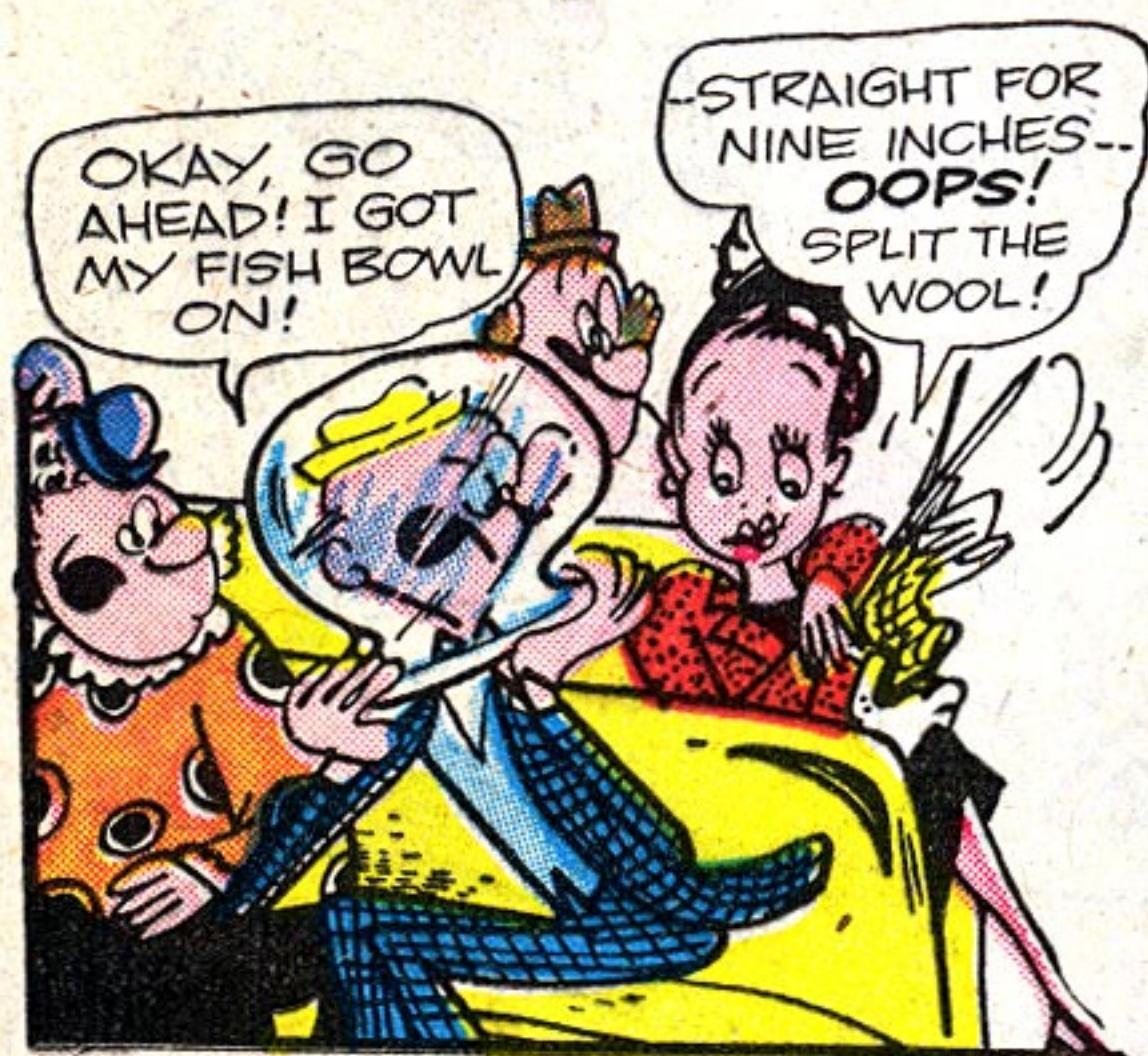

His son gasped. “YOU! I thought mom—”

“No—it was me! I’ll tell you a secret! That tuxedo you ripped was as old-fashioned as a bustle! And that bow tie—WHEW! I’ve wanted to burn them both for a long time, but your mother never let me! I’m GLAD that you ruined them!” Then his father’s face became grim. “But if I ever catch you practicing on those drums while I’m around, I’ll beat the hide off you for ruining my clothes! Get me?” Pop winked.
